The rose-coloured ouzel, a native of Italy and the warmer regions of Europe, as well as of many other parts of the globe, in England appears only as an occasional visitant: its size is nearly that of a starling: it is highly remarkable for the elegance of its colors: the head, neck, wings, and tail being black, with varying glosses of green and purple, while the remainder of the bird is of a beautiful pale rose-color. It feeds, in general, on insects, and especially on the different kinds of locusts; for which reason it is considered as a kind of sacred bird in some of the Eastern countries, where it contributes greatly to the destruction of those noxious animals. This is said to be particularly the case in the neighbourhood of Aleppo. A beautiful specimen of this bird was shot in the course of the last year in Oxfordshire, of which an account was politely communicated by Captain Jenner, of the marines.
