4. Remarks on the Numbers and on the Phylogenetic Development of the Remiges of Birds. By HANS GADOW, Ph.D., M.A., F.Z.S., Strickland Curator and Lecturer on the Advanced Morphology of Vertebrata in the University of Cambridge.

[Received November 30, 1888.]

PART I.

The number and size of the primaries or metacarpo-digital quills have been examined by various ornithologists (Coues, Gerbe, Jeffries, Wallace¹), and have often been used as taxonomic characters, especially in the Order of Passeres. The statements hitherto published are, however, not always in harmony with each other, and moreover are not free from mistakes.

Considering that the results yielded by a renewed and more comprehensive examination of the points in question may possibly influence the systematic position of some genera or even subfamilies, I submit the following tables (pp. 658-664) for the acceptance of the Zoological Society of London. They contain the results of some investigations which I have recently made. Many of the specimens examined were fresh or had been preserved in spirits. Of many species several specimens have been examined, in order to exclude doubt, which occasionally arises, in the cases of moulting or imperfect or very small birds.

The remarks which I have to offer are scanty, not only because the whole matter is rather dry, but because I have abstained from testing the taxonomic value of the arrangement of the terminal primaries by correlating their features with other known characters. At any rate the following tables show such considerable variations of the terminal quills within the limits of avowedly closely allied genera and subfamilies, that we ought to refrain from generalizations. The same remark applies to the presence or absence of the fifth cubital quill. Although this character was discovered by Gerbe in 1877, and has lately been rediscovered by Wray, it remains still unexplained, young birds not throwing any light upon the question. The presence of this fifth quill is indicated by a +, its absence by a — in the accompanying tables. The other columns contain the total number of primaries, and the way in which this number is composed of metacarpal and the various digital quills.

The most important result is evidence of the gradual reduction in number of the functional quills. With the exception of Struthio and the Spheniscidæ, the number of primaries or metacarpo-digital quills varies between 12 and 10. Amongst the birds which possess 12 primaries, the Podicipedidæ, many Pelargi, and Rhea possess 7 metacarpal and 5 digital quills, whilst Apteryx has 8 metacarpal and only 4 digital quills. In all other birds the reduction from 12 to 11 is due to the reduction from 7 to 6 of the metacarpal quills. Abdimia stands alone with 7 metacarpals, and only one quill carried by the second phalanx of the second digit. The 11th or terminal quill is never fully developed and hardly functional; it is invariably much shortened, and is hidden between its upper and lower covert; not unfrequently it is shorter and weaker than its upper, often very stiff covert. In some birds, e. g. in certain Fulicariæ and in the Passeres, the 11th quill is very tiny indeed, or it is altogether absent. In this case, however, the upper covert is present as an apparently supernumerary feather, provided that the 10th quill is not likewise much reduced. The 10th primary shows every intermediate stage between the largest possible development, as in Larus and Cypselus, and a very degenerate condition, as in many of the so-called Oscines novempennatæ. In the latter birds it was first properly recognized as a true primary by Baird, in his 'Review of American Birds.' In all cases the reduction from 11 to 10 primaries is brought about by the reduction at the terminal end of the wing.

The reduced terminal quill occasionally assumes the shape and coloration of its lower covert, and does not agree with the other primaries nor with its upper covert, as one might be predisposed to think would be the case. In Neophron percnopterus, for instance, the 11th quill is more than 4 centim. long and quite white like the lower wing-coverts, not black like the upper coverts and the other primaries. The same is the case with Grus leucogeranus. The terminal or 11th quill of Oriolus is very small, and yellow like the lower wing-coverts. In Rupicola it is very tiny, reddish like the lower coverts, and hidden by a very stiff upper covert of 4 centim. in length. This is one of many cases in which the 11th upper covert is longer and much stronger than its primary quill, so that it even acts as a substitute for the latter.

Passeres.

It is hardly necessary to mention that there are numerous transitional stages which connect the four groups A, B, C, D into which Wallace has divided the Passeres. There can be no doubt about the fact that the reduction of the 9th and 10th primaries has taken place in the various families independently; identical conditions of the terminal quills do not therefore necessarily indicate relationship. Some Alaudidæ belong to Group D according to the state of their primaries; Lanius minor differs strikingly from all the other Laniinæ. The Vireoninæ are probably now in an unsettled state, to judge from the variable relative size of their terminal quills. Heteralocha does not agree with the Sturnidæ.

The gradual diminution of the 10th primary can well be studied in Group D.

In some cases there might be some doubt whether the little terminal feather in question is in reality a primary, but this can easily be settled by the presence of the corresponding upper covert. Moreover there are many cases in which this primary is still longer than its covert. When the 10th or 11th quill is much shortened, the corresponding lower covert is absent in the Passeres. The Alaudidæ prove that the 10th quill is capable of being shifted dorsalwards, so that it becomes enclosed between the outer rane of the 9th primary and the 10th upper covert, instead of being situated freely visible below and in front of the 9th primary; when seen from below, it is hidden by the outer vane of the 9th primary. This shifting explains the conditions which are the rule amongst the birds of Group D. The 11th primary undergoes a similar dislocation in a more marked degree.

Group A.—With 10 long primaries. The 10th quill is, with few exceptions (e. g. Hylactes), very little shortened, and partakes of the formation of the tip of the wing. The 11th quill is frequently present, although small and hidden. When it is absent, at least its upper covert is present as a stiff and well-developed little feather.

To this group belong all the Passeres non-oscines.

Group B.—With 10 distinct, functional primaries. The 10th is always considerably shortened and, as a rule, hardly reaches to one third towards the tip of the wing, rarely halfway towards the tip, as in the Corvidæ.

A small 11th quill is frequently present, but almost invariably hidden between its upper covert and the 10th primary. Where the 11th quill is absent, its covert is not always present. This indicates a further reduction of the quills in comparison with the wing of the non-oscine Passeres.

To this group belongs the majority of the so-called Oscines decem-pennatæ, which correspond with Wallace's series of Typical or Turdoid Passeres.

Group C.—Transitional group from B to D, comprising the Sturnoid Passeres of Wallace. The numerous and considerable exceptions destroy the validity of this group. General characters are:—10 distinct primaries; the 9th is long and helps to form the tip of the wing. The 10th primary is considerably shortened. The 11th primary is lost completely, but its upper covert is still present; the latter is, as a rule, very small, except in Heteralocha, where it reaches a length of 1·5 centim.

Group D.—With only 9 functional primaries. The 9th quill always partakes of the formation of the tip of the wing, and is frequently the largest of all. The 10th quill is, as a rule, reduced to a tiny feather, which is hidden between the 10th covert and outer vane of the 9th quill. This hidden portion is always assumed by the 10th quill, even when it is still tolerably well developed, as in the Hirundinidæ and in the Icteridæ, i. e. in birds in which it is stated to be absent by most ornithologists. The 11th upper covert is frequently present.

To this group belong the so-called "Oscines novem-pennatæ," corresponding with the Tanagroid Passeres of Wallace, and with the section Fringilliformes of the Cat. Birds Brit. Mus.

PART II.

A few Remarks on the Phylogenetic Development of the Remiges.

Mr. Wray has shown that the one or two rows of greater under wing-coverts, Sundevall's "tectrices aversæ," were originally situated on the dorsal side of the wing, like the remiges themselves, and that the two hinder series of feathers gradually, during the growth of the embryo, are pushed into the ventral side of the wing. This is probably due to the greater development of the remiges proper, and to the formation of the fascia tendinea, which connects the basal portions of all the remiges with each other.

Since this interesting discovery has been made, it is easier to understand the relations between the remiges and greater under wing-coverts in the Ratitæ and Spheniscidæ, and moreover to arrive at a possible explanation of the phylogenesis of the remiges from a general point of view.

Struthio possesses 20–23 cubital and 16 metacarpo-digital remiges. Of the primaries, 8 are carried by the metacarpal bones, one by the remnant of the third finger, 4 by the first, and 3 by the second phalanx of the second finger. There is only one series or row of greater under wing-coverts.

Rhea has only 12 primaries, like certain Carinate birds. The total absence of greater under wing-coverts is probably due to their degeneration.

Spheniscidæ.—Fürbringer draws attention to the fact that in the Spheniscidæ there are more than 30 rows of little scale-like feathers on the dorsal and on the ventral aspect of the wing, i. e. a greater number of rows than there are present in any other bird, even all the median, lesser and marginal coverts included. The largest of these feathers are not, like in other birds, the most ulnar series, but the last but one series on the hand, and the second and third last dorsal rows of the forearm. Each of these rows contains 25–27 feathers on the arm, and 35–36 on the hand. Fürbringer rightly hints at two possible explanations of this exceptional condition. Either that the Spheniscidæ have lost all their true primaries, which they possibly originally possessed, and that this row of 36 feathers does not represent primaries at all; or perhaps that only every third feather represents a primary, although now degenerated, whilst the other 24 feathers are modified down-feathers. However, neither of these two assumptions is supported by facts. That the number of feathers in one row amounts to 36, i. e. three times the number of primaries of certain other Carinate birds, is most probably an accidental coincidence; otherwise one might assume that of every three feathers of the Penguins, one had become a primary and the other two had been transformed into tectrices aversæ.

I find that in a large specimen of Aptenodytes pennanti there are no tectrices aversæ, all the feathers of the ventral aspect of the wing looking ventralwards with their convex surfaces. This circumstance suggests the assumption that in the Penguins no rows of feathers have been turned ventralwards around the posterior or ulnar margin of the wing, and that these birds have retained a primitive condition. If we mark the last dorsal posterior series of the Penguin's potential primaries with A, then A will in Struthio represent the only existing series of greater under coverts, whilst the primaries of Struthio have to be marked B. This series B has overgrown the series A, as is already indicated by the fact that in the Penguins the last but one series, viz. B, contains somewhat larger feathers. Lastly, in the majority of Carinatae A and B represent the larger under coverts, and the series C, i. e. the third last of the Penguins, has been developed into the series of primaries, whilst series D forms the upper larger wing-coverts.

This would mean of course that the Penguins retain a condition which in other birds is referred to their embryonic life, whilst Struthio represents an intermediate stage, provided, however, that in Struthio no secondary reduction from several to one series of under wing-coverts has taken place. Such a reduction I assume in Rhea, and likewise in the Oscines, which possess only one row of larger under wing-coverts. However, Mr. Wray has shown that Struthio shows various conditions which in the Carinatae are repeated during their embryonic growth only.

Unfortunately, about the embryonic development of the Penguin's wing we know nothing; we cannot explain either the enormous number of series of the wing-feathers nor the number of the feathers in each series; we have to look upon them as the result of special modifications. There is no reason why the skin of the wing should not develop any number of feathers. Concerning the cubital quills, we know that their number increases with the length of the forearm, the additional increase in number taking place in the region of the elbow.

Archæopteryx does not throw much light upon the question. It possessed 6-7 primaries, most of which were carried by the third metacarpal and by the third finger. The number of cubitals was 10.

The first Reptile-like Birds probably possessed a rather uniform covering of feathers on their wings. The feathers of the under surface were soft, more downy, those of the upper surface stronger and smoother. The first feathers which grew out stronger and larger were those on the upper hinder margin of the forearm; this resulted in a protection of the sides of the body, and in the possibility of these feathers being occasionally used as a parachute. Natural selection preserved and improved these advantageous acquisitions, in a similar way as the scales on the hinder margin of the "fins" of Turtles are elongated and flattened out. Later on the elongation and strengthening of the posterior marginal feathers extended over the metacarpus and over the fingers, which at this stage were still free and not ankylosed with each other. If these ancestral birds possessed a cutaneous patagium, this was gradually restricted to the proximal region between arm and trunk, where no remiges are developed. Such a structure might have interfered with the folding-up of the wing.

The first finger had already inherited from the Reptiles a tendency towards shortening ; it remained therefore outside the series of the other fingers, and partook of the formation of the wing to a small extent only. The next two metacarpal bones and those of the second finger became elongated and thus anchylosed, because of their contemporary and one-sided use. The other bones of the middle hand and other fingers were reduced in size and number, since the newly gained and much strengthened axis necessitated their presence no longer ; moreover a fully developed third, fourth, and fifth finger would have much interfered with the folding of the wing, which is effected by a strong abduction towards the ulnar side. Purely mechanical reasons caused the primaries to grow into quills stronger and larger than the secondaries. In the embryos of many birds the remiges of the forearm appear earlier and for some time grow more rapidly than those of the hand, until they are overtaken by the primaries ; thus they still repeat their phylogenetic development.

After the reduction and partial anchylosis of the skeleton of the hand has once taken place it is impossible to redevelop the lost fingers and to free or separate the anchylosed metacarpals again. The wing of the Ratitæ does in no way differ from that of the typical Carinatae. Fürbringer concludes therefore rightly that the present Ratitæ are the descendants of birds which once possessed the power of flight. Now their remiges are soft, or, as in Casuarus, have partly lost their vanes, but such soft quills could never have caused the anchylosis of the hand-skeleton. The relatively very considerable size of the whole anterior extremity of Ostrich embryos is an additional support to this view. In a similar way the length of the humerus of the Eocene Palæudyptes is a weighty reason against the separation of the Penguins from the other Carinatae.
